"LITTLE MISS FIX-IT"

KATIE sat on the porch steps, her chin in her hands. She sighed, and then she sighed again. She had no way of knowing how long George had been standing there watching her with that half-smile on his lips. She only knew of his presence when he plumped himself down alongside her and said, "Well, if it isn't the Theory of Relativity that's worrying you, maybe it's the problem before the United Nations."

She glanced up at him, unamused. "It's worse than that," she said emphatically. "It's Donald."

"DONALD! Don't tell me that my best friend is trying to beat my time with you?"

"Oh, really . . . you ought to know it's nothing like that."

"I didn't think so," George decided, relieved. "After all, Don and Marge are such a thing . . ."

"But that's just the trouble," Katie looked at her steady with a withering glance. "Do you mean he hasn't said anything to you about breaking up with Marge? Why, Marge called me over an hour ago and told me the whole story. It's tragic," and Katie let her lower lip tremble a little, just to show George how really affected she was.

"I admit I haven't seen Don this morning," George told her dubiously. "But last night I saw him coming home from his date with Marge and I'll admit he didn't look very happy."

"You see!" Katie said, as if that settled the matter.

"But that still doesn't mean . . ." But both George and Katie caught sight of the same thing at the same time. Donald, walking down the street looking very downcast indeed.

The two leaped up from their porch step and raced quickly but determinedly toward the waiting Donald.

"All right now . . ." Donald suspected what the conversation was going to be even before they said a word. "I can see Marge has called you up, Katie, and told you the whole thing. So there isn't any more I can say, is there?"

"Now, Don," George began. "Don't let this thing upset you. I'm sure with a little expert handling, Katie and I can have you two back together again."

"Sure we can," Katie added eagerly and confidently.

"Just hold on there," Don lifted both hands to stop their plans. "Get a few things straight. Fact Number One: Marge and I have broken up! Number Two: It's fine with both of us! Fact Number Three: We would definitely not appreciate two well-meaning friends trying to patch us up! Is that clear?"

"I-I guess so," Katie murmured, defeated.

"Sure, Don, ol' boy," George told him. "We'll just forget about the whole thing." He pulled Katie back to the porch step again. "See ya around, fellow," he waved to Don.

"You heard him," George told Katie. "Now just get all those cupid thoughts out of your head."

"You're a gullible fool, George March," she said. "Obviously he didn't mean anything of the kind. Why, it was even sort of an invitation for us to do whatever we can for them. Why would he be so emphatic if he really didn't care?"

"Look," George began wearily. "I'm not a psychiatrist or a mind-reader. I only know what people tell me. And Donald told us to forget about it . . . and that's exactly what you and I are going to do!" He looked at her. "Aren't we?"

Katie knew when diplomacy was important. "Of course we are, dear. Now run along. I've got some things to do."

Katie waited just long enough to see George disappear around the corner, when she scrambled up, ran to the telephone, and dialed Marge's number.

". . . And he looked absolutely despondent!" she finished.

"That's too bad," Marge surprised Katie by saying. "If he was going to be broken up about it, I wonder why he agreed to my suggestion in the first place."

"You mean . . ." It took a little time for the words to sink in. "You made the suggestion that you break up?"

"Sure . . . didn't I make that plain this morning? I thought we've been going steady too long, and it would be a good idea if we went with somebody else."

"And he agreed?"

"Sure, he'd been thinking it over too, he said."

"Well, I never . . ." Katie said to herself after she hung up the phone. Then she sat down and started to think. This wasn't like Don and Marge. They'd been going together too long, and they were so happy, and looked so cute together. Why, they were practically inseparable. This silly agreement couldn't be the truth. It was just a pose. They both were too proud to admit they'd had a quarrel.

An hour or so more of thinking, and Katie had devised a plan. If they were going to be such fools about it, somebody would have to take a hand. She put her plan into action at once.

"Hello, Don . . ." she said over the phone. "Since you're not going with Marge any more, you probably haven't gotten a date lined up for the dance tonight."

She smiled as she heard his negative answer. "Well, I have a date for you . . . she's a real fine girl, you'll like her, I promise."

After getting Don's definite "yes" for a reply, she hung up, then determinedly called Marge.

"Sure, if you guarantee he's real nice and I'll like him, I'll go," Marge told Katie.

She didn't have too much time to gloat over her triumph before George stuck his head through the door. "Mind if we double-date tonight," he asked her. "I just arranged to take Pete and Diane, two new kids in the neighborhood, with us to the dance tonight."

"Fine, if you don't mind triple-dating," Katie said. A few seconds of serious deliberation, and she decided against letting George in on the plan.

"I've just arranged a date for Don . . . since he's not going with Marge," she added quickly. "So he's meeting his date here at my house."

"O.K.," George nodded agreeably. "The more, the merrier."

Marge arrived that night just a scant few minutes before Don came up the front walk.

"Oh, no, Katie . . . how could you?" Marge asked when she saw him walk in.

The smile on Katie's face faded a little, and died completely as Don said, "You mean my blind date was you, Marge?" Then he turned to Katie, "Did you two girls cook this plot up?"

"I was only trying to get you to stop acting so childish," Katie said righteously.

"You're the one who's childish, Katie," Marge said. "Don and I meant it when we said we were breaking up."

"It's not that I mind going with Marge tonight," Don explained. "But we had decided we were seeing too much of each other."

George's car pulled up outside, and the horn sounded. When no one appeared at the door, George opened the door for Pete and Diane. "Come on in and meet everybody," he invited.

They saw, standing in the middle of the living room three hopeless and very chagrined people. "What the . . ." George started.

"Oh, don't you scold me too," Katie pleased. "I've just been getting the riot act read to me by these two," and she pointed and turned to Marge and Don. She expected to see them glaring at her. They weren't.

They were looking at Pete and Diane. Rather, Don was looking at Diane, and Pete was looking at Marge.

Katie introduced everybody, then added pointedly. "Don and Marge were going steady, but they're not any more."

Diane looked up brightly. "I've never gone steady with anyone." Then she saw Don look at Pete questioningly. "Pete's just a good friend . . . we live next door," she explained hurriedly.

As they all left Katie's house to go on to the dance, Pete helped Marge on with her coat. Then Don held the door for Diane. After a moment, George and Katie looked at each other, then back to the exchange of couples.

"Let this be a lesson to you, little Miss Fix-it," he said sternly to Katie. "Don't meddle in other people's affairs. Why, do you realize what a miserable evening those two could have had if your little plan had gone through?"

Katie smiled. It wasn't exactly a smile of triumph, but nevertheless, it showed great self-satisfaction. "Now, George, it turned out fine, didn't it?" she said. "Let's get to the dance . . . I think we're all going to have a very good time."

IN FACT I'M GOING TO GO AND MAKE UP WITH HER! I'LL APOLOGIZE FOR HAVING BEEN SO SNIPPY!
BUT WHAT IF SHE DOESN'T ACCEPT MY APOLOGY??
WHAT IF SHE'S SNIPPY TO ME?

IT WOULD BE JUST LIKE HER... THAT... THAT... RED-HEAD!
JUST FOR THAT, I WON'T MAKE UP WITH YOU EVER! SO THERE!
AND THAT, ACCORDING TO HEDY HERSELF, IS HOW IT ALL STARTED...
I'M SO GLAD THAT NICE PATSY WALKER MOVED TO TOWN!
